ALIAS MR. HOWARD

CHARLEY FORD miled his companions and looked across the table at his youngest brother:

"We'll have good pickings tomorrow," he said. "The bank at Westmont. A pretty twenty thousand—maybe more."

"Bah! Ford hit all a new al to have." "There ain't money at it yet," he said. "When in on the time?"

Charley was slipping the key into the empty chamber of his gun.

"Seven altogether," he replied. "That's enough; it's a small town. There's you and me, Bill Wiggins, Matt McKinley, Darby Smith, Ed Lincoln and, of course, the great Mr. Howard."

He almost spat out the last name. Charley Ford did not like Mr. Howard. He was jealous of his leadership of the most decorated band of bank and train robbers in the West. Mr. Howard was an unusual type of desperado. Unlike the men he led, he was not a killer by nature. He was bent on the draw but only when he found it necessary to shoot his way out of a possible trap. The men who followed him, and all but the Ford brothers were loyal, went up to shoot him, and then go about the business of looting some northern bank or mail car. Most of them were known by sight to the various Western law officers. They almost had a long standing name.

"Shoot to kill. Rape is worse." "Ed Ford hit and his gun hit around his wrist."

"Where are we meeting tonight?" he asked. "Right here," his brother replied. "Any minutes now."

THE man in the doorway had the words in his mouth. Five horsemen galloped up to the entrance of the well fortified Ford cabin. They dismounted and entered without the formality of knocking. A hard eyed man of medium height took his rightful place as leader of the group. For moments that no one else could understand he talked to himself. Frank Howard.

"Pull up some chairs," he ordered. "This was quickly done. Howard spread a worn map of the Westmont bank on the table. "This is it," he said. "McKinley and Wiggins went over there yesterday and looked it over. They took the map. It ain't the best in the world but it's plenty good enough for us."

McKinley and Wiggins grinned. Mr. Howard nodded.

"We stick tomorrow at noon," he said. "The streets will be pretty clear by then. Most folks will be at home eating dinner."

Ed Lincoln was the first of the gang to ask a question.

"Where will the sheriff and his posse be?"

"Clipping a ghost," replied Frank Howard. "They'll get a tip that the Dalton gang is in the neighborhood. When they start the chase we move in. Simple, eh?"

The boys nodded. They were disgusted with Mr. Howard. And now Darby Smith had a question.

"How long will it take us to break into the vault?"

"We'll blow it in a few minutes," Howard replied.

He laid a forefinger on the sketch of the bank. "Here's what we do," he mentioned. "We move in town as usual as possible, but not together. I'll lead the way. After me the rest of you come in two at a time. We will head for the bank. When we get near the entrance I'll give a signal with a wave of my hand."

He demonstrated by bringing his hand up to his forehead.

When that happens me and the Ford brothers will enter into the bank, then on the night and plant our dynamite near the vault door. I got a mine and a bull horn set for it. When we're doing the rest of you stay by the main entrance and guard. Have your guns out but don't shoot unless somebody starts it. Wiggins and McKinley will lead Smith, Smith and Lincoln will lead North. Clear the street with lead, if you have to, but be careful of any women or kids."

Darby Smith grinned. "I'll be taking my neck again," he said. "I ain't gonna be in any line when you're pretty straight shooter's partner in my line."

Frank Howard looked at him.

"I'm warning you, Smith," he said. "Keep that gun at your side and not out. I don't want nothing like what happened in Carson last month."

THE word on the bank at Carson had found its way into a bloody office. Darby Smith had started the horsemen even before the gang moved into the bank. When the shooting was over. Tent of Mr. Howard's men were dead, along with several of the worthy citizens of Carson.

"One thing more," he said. "Stay mounted, and keep out there horses on check. We'll be leaving this bank in a hurry."

His eyes went from one late teller to the other.

"Atty quite dead?" he asked.

Charley Ford nodded.

"Yeah," he said. "Who's gonna tell the Sheriff the Dalton gang is next by?"

Frank Howard smiled.

"A few more dollars will do the trick," he said.

"And I know a man in Westmont who is always running out of silver dollars. He's a member of the posse."

A FEW minutes before noon the following day a Inn horseman entered the small town of Westmont. He deserted his mount along the main street toward the bank. Shortly afterward Bob and Charley Ford rode into town. They were followed by Ed Lincoln and Docy Smith. The last to enter were Wiggin and McKinley. The streets were even more deserted than the gang had anticipated. But the windows of the buildings opposite the bank were not so empty of life as they appeared to be. Many pairs of eyes were focused on the gang as they congregated inside the bank entrance. Mr. Howard had paid his silver dollars to a man named Jude.

A blast of gunfire shattered the radio silence. A multitude of bullets panted from several windows opposite the bank. Wiggin was literally blown from his horse.

He died as his fingers closed around the barrel of his gun. McKinley's horse dropped dead. The gunman leaped clear and yanked out both his shoulders. He pumped lead into the building on his left as his fingers could squeeze the trigger. A blast from a shotgun spun him around, and firing his shattered corpse into the muddy gutter. Howard and the other members of the gang were directly in front of the bank entrance when the shooting started. As they were still mounted they quickly put spurs in their horses and galloped out of town, firing wildly at anything that moved. Ed Lincoln nearly made it. He was shot from his horse near the North entrance of Westmont. Bob Ford died in a pool of blood from the slavers' 12-man posse. They appeared, next by night. From a dark street and quickly gave chase. Frank Howard, Charley Ford and Docy Smith drove their mounts to the point of execution. They rode like wild men as bullets whistled past their heads. A few hundred yards from Docy's horse was struck. The rider tumbled to the ground. He came up with both knees bleeding and managed to unhorse two members of the posse. Staniel Johnson of Westmont planned a bullet between the gunman's eyes. Docy Smith died as it had lived, violently, with a smoking tin-snuffer in each hand.

THE three continued. But Frank Howard and Charley Ford anticipated the prospect. They reached the saloon of the Ford cabin.

"Sure sorry about your death," said Howard.

Charley Ford looked at his teacher.

"He took the turn of chance as the rest of us," he replied.

"We've went out," he said. "Nobody left but you and me. What happens now?"

Frank Howard walked about the small room. His horse was at the end.

"The duty day I paid to tell the sheriff about the Dalton gang crossed me. That's a score I settle as soon as I can."

He reloaded his six guns.

"We'll have to stay in hiding for a while," he said. "I'll get in touch with you soon."

He left the cabin.

Several days later a poster was tacked to a nearby tree.

"It's high enough now," said Charley Ford, as he read the details.

Fifteen thousand dollars was offered as reward for the man who killed Sheriff Frank Howard. The poster stipulated "Dead or Alive."

NOT long after Charley Ford peered through the window of a cabin he knew as well as he knew his own. Mr. Howard was standing on a chair. He was straightening a picture on the wall. His gunbelt lay across a chair. Ford drew his tin snuffer and took careful aim at his teacher's unprotected back. He fired one shot. He had no need to fire another.

The last people still alive their momentary moment with these words.

"Oh, the duty battle against who shot Mr.

Howard.

And last poor Jew as his grave."

And what happened to Charley Ford? He collected his reward and went off to the West where he was killed in a gunfight with a bandit named Kelly.

How Clever Are You? — by ERICKLEY

LATE ONE NIGHT INSPECTOR STRAUB WAS CALLED TO THE DWIGHT HOME. MRS. DWIGHT HAD BEEN MURDERED!

DWIGHT'S STORY →

MRS. DWIGHT AND I WERE RETURNING HOME FROM A SHOW AND AS WE WERE APPROACHING THE HOUSE, TWO MEN STEPPED FROM BEHIND AND HELD US UP!

MRS. DWIGHT RESISTED AND ONE OF THE MEN STRUCK HER ON THE HEAD — SHE DIED INSTANTLY.

THE TWO MEN FLED — I PICKED HER UP AND CARRIED HER INTO THE HOUSE — THEN I CALLED THE POLICE.

ARREST DWIGHT FOR THE MURDER OF HIS WIFE — HE MADE UP THAT STORY!

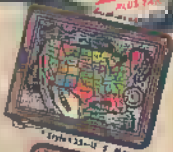

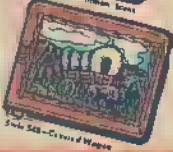

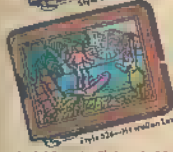

SEE IF YOU CAN FIND THE EVIDENCE WHICH PROVED DWIGHT'S STORY FALSE — THEN READ THE ANSWER.

ANSWER — MRS. DWIGHT'S HAT WHICH IS IN PERFECT CONDITION HER GLOVES AND PURSE ARE HEAVILY TYING ON THE TABLE WHICH SHOWS THAT SHE PLACED THEM THERE HERSELF AND LATER RECEIVED THE FATAL BLOW! NOT BEFORE SHE REACHED THE HOUSE AS DWIGHT HAD TOLD THE INSPECTOR.
